7. 講義概要: This lecture will introduce my academic journey and my current research at Waseda University in Japan. I will start by providing a brief overview of my educational background, the cities I have lived in, and what inspired me to study anthropology. I will also briefly share my experience of doing research at Waseda University. Next, I will present sociocultural anthropology, explain its subject and methodology, and why it is useful for understanding contemporary societies. Then, I will explore the concept of soft power, paying particular attention to the strategic role of culture and education in an international context. Finally, I will present my ongoing research on two French international schools in Japan, which looks at how education operates at the intersection of culture, identity, and diplomacy. The lecture will conclude with a Q&A session.

The lecture was structured into three main sections, introducing my academic background and my current research at Waseda University in Japan. I began with a brief overview of my educational journey, the cities I have lived in and what motivated me to study anthropology. I also shared my experience of conducting research at Waseda University.

The second part of the lecture introduced sociocultural anthropology, outlining its key subject areas and methodologies and explaining why it is relevant for understanding contemporary societies. In the final section, I presented my ongoing research in two French international schools in Japan. This research looks at how education interplays with culture, identity, and diplomacy. I also provided brief explanations of two political concepts that are central to my research focus in Japan: multiculturalism and soft power.

The session concluded with a short Q&A, after which there was a 15-minute informal discussion with the pupils. Overall, the pupils were highly engaged, asked questions about my experience and anthropology, and participated enthusiastically in the discussion.
