Can humanity move on to post-economic stage of development? If yes, then how do lay people conceptualise post-economic development? The dominating since World War II paradigm of societal development focused on economic growth, but increasing body of research suggests that it urgently needs to be replaced by post-economic paradigms. I presented results of the study on lay people's preferences towards societal development. I described three compasses on how lay people conceptualize post-economic societal growth: social capital, welfare society, and open society.
